Portraiture and the act of creating a likeness have challenged artists throughout the centuries. Paul Vollman will share what he has learned during his journey as an artist. Participants will increase their knowledge of portraiture in general and will have ample time to work on their own paintings.

Saturday morning Paul will discuss portraits in general and the specific methods of well known portrait painters including Daniel Greene and John Howard Sanden. Then in the afternoon he will do a live portrait demo from a model. On Sunday the attendees will paint a portrait from their own photo reference and Paul will provide individual "at easel" critique and instruction.

According to Paul, Daniel Green's genius lies in the simplicity he brings to the process. He strips away the mystery and narrows the process down to its essential fundamentals. For instance, he has developed an array of colors that he says encompasses all the flesh tones you will encounter on any person of any ethnicity. And I think he is correct. In addition, the colors are beautiful and really help you to create remarkable depth. Finally, he provides a unique method for drawing the subject's head – quickly. In the seminar Paul will concentrate on explaining and demonstrating these two basic techniques. However, he will also touch on a lot of issues that effect portrait painting and painting in general - including, values, color temperature, and hue, how to learn perspective properly and quickly, plus the pitfalls of photography and how to avoid them.
